THE COLONEL'S MESSAGE

To the past and present members of the 329th Infantry:

"This history is taken from the official records of the 329th Infantry.

It covers the battle actions of the regiment from the dogged yard by yard bloody and uninspiring slugging match of the hedgerows of Normandy, to our spectacular dash from the Rhine to the Elbe.

The record of accomplishments of the 329th is one of which any member may justifiably be proud. This record of battles won and of ground gained and held is the composite picture of many smaller fights where the decisive action was the marching fire of the rifleman, the steadfastness of the machine gunner under attack or the bravery of the bazooka man stalking a tank. The spirit and determination of the individual made possible the winning of important battles.

These successes have not been won cheaply. Beneath the soil of Europe lie the bodies of over 850 of our comrades. To the hospitals have gone nearly 4000 others wounded in action. Most of these were killed or wounded because when the time came for them to decide between safety and duty they chose the latter. Our debt to them cannot be paid."

TRAINING

WE ARE ACTIVATED AND TRAINED

During the summer months of 1942 many of us were still civilians. At the time, our Country was in the process of building the greatest Army in its History. Germany and Japan would be defeated. The months of September and October came along and from practically every State in the Union, thousands of well known letters, signed by our President, reached us. We reported to our Draft Boards, took physicals, blood tests, and signed various forms which at that time did not seem too important. This was it and we knew it. Next came the Reception Center with its lengthy processing, more physicals and aptitude examinations which we nervously completed. In a canvas tent, hall or open field we took the Oath. WE WERE IN THE ARMY!

Rank — private. Serial number — 31131313.

The troop train pulled out and every recruit cursed the conductor for keeping its destination a secret. Our first Army gripe was probably, "This is a free country, why in hell can't you tell us where we're going?" The conductor merely smiled — he was still a lucky civilian. We fell asleep, draping our rough olive drab uniform over the next unfortunate draftee.

"Fall out and line up. This is Camp Atterbury, Indiana. You men are now part of the 83rd Infantry Division." This was the sharp greeting some sergeant barked. An Infantry Division . . . Infantry . . . no, not that! The 83rd Infantry Division, commanded by Major General Frank W. Milburn, consisted mainly of three Infantry Regiments: the 329th, 330th, and 331st. We were sent to the 329th, commanded by Colonel Edwin B. Crabill, to begin training as infantrymen, the feet of the Army. They were the same feet which later marched from the coast of Normandy across France, Luxembourg, Belgium, Holland, Germany and over to the east bank of the Elbe River just short of Berlin.

The enlisted Basic Cadre from the 2nd Cavalry Division, Fort Riley Kansas, the officers from the IRTC at Fort McClellan, Alabama and the 90 day wonders from Fort Benning, Georgia were the only men present for duty on the 15th of August, 1942, the day that the 329th Infantry Regiment was activated. By November 9th the Regiment had received enough Filler Replacements from the Replacement System to bring its strength up to the Table of Organization requirement, and as a result our Basic Training began.

Basic Training: Fresh 2nd Lieutenants . . . Crusty Sergeants . . . Close order drill . . . By the left flank, march . . . By the right flank, march . . . To the rear, march . . . Full field inspections . . . Latrine orderly . . . Rifle range . . . Bull's eye . . . Maggie's drawers . . . Nomenclature of the M-1, 0-3, heavy and light machine guns, mortars . . . Week-end passes to Indianapolis . . . Marches with full field . . . Bayonet course . . . Weeks of training in bitter weather, snow, and high winds; at last the 13 weeks were over, and the recruits were now regarded as qualified soldiers.

We then received a welcome seven day furlough. Returning we found our companies undergoing Unit Training; there were company problems at first, then Battalion problems. We learned to attack, to deploy, to set up defenses, and to maneuver around enemy strongpoints. This Unit Training lasted ten full weeks, and then we were regarded as good infantrymen.

Advanced Training ended with a week's problem in the old familiar areas, X Y Z. We marched all day and bivouaced late at night; during those last days of the problem continual rain fell. We plodded along in the deep mud, slept on soggy ground with wet fatigues, and cleaned our rifles several times a day so they wouldn't get too rusty. With all this training behind us, we qualified as expert infantrymen.

Tennessee Maneuvers were next on the schedule and the regiment left Camp Atterbury and arrived in Tennessee on the 5th of July, 1943 where we set up the defense of an area east of Lebanon in preparation for the actual Maneuvers. The Maneuvers called for 8 phases each of which was classified as a problem. We worked with or fought against such well known outfits as the 80th Infantry Division, the 10th Armored Division, the 101st Airborne Division, and the 16th Cavalry. We all remember those long marches in the broiling sun with only one canteen of water. The majority of us lasted out these conditioning marches but a few of us dropped off to the side, completely exhausted. We learned what it meant to live on K rations and, if we were lucky, maybe one or two cooked meals a day. We defended the Cumberland River and at one time were pushed back by the Armor. On another problem we secured a bridgehead across the Cumberland after much confusion. Umpires with white and red flags were everywhere flagging us down. Some clown continually appeared with a little bell hollering, "I guess you know that artillery is falling here", whereupon everyone dashed for shelter in half dug foxholes. When we look back at it now we were actually training for that dash across Germany, for every time a problem ended the "Buckshot" Regiment was out in front — always breaking through. On August the 8th a "cub" plane flew over the regimental sector and blew its siren; "Maneuvers are over" we all shouted, and with that wonderful news in mind, we fired into the air every round of blank ammunition that we could find.

The tired regiment took ten days of rest and recuperation in the vicinity of Springfield where it rained day after day, completely flooding our bivouac areas. Then came the memorable march from Springfield to Camp Breckinridge, Kentucky, a distance of over a hundred miles; we were fatigued to the limit of endurance, but, by now, we knew that we were a well trained and hardened group of men. For five days we marched and marched stopping only to get a much needed night's rest. On some days a 2 1/2 ton truck picked us up and drove us half of the distance to be covered for that day.

At last Breckinridge, and the only thing that stopped us from going over the hill was the announcement that 14 day furloughs would be given to all members of the command. Up until February the regiment underwent specialized training, and during this month we received many enlisted replacements from the 63rd Infantry Division, Camp Van Dorn, Mississippi. They arrived in time to complete POM (Preparation for Overseas Movement). Another short furlough and then the War Department decided that the 83rd Infantry Division was ready for shipment and eventual combat. It was here at Breckinridge also that General Robert C. Macon took command of the Division, after General Milburn's transfer.

Our comparatively comfortable garrison life was finished on March 24th, 1944. The Regiment left Camp Breckinridge and after a pleasant train ride pulled into Camp Shanks, New York, a port of Embarkation. Final check-ups on our health, equipment, and ability were given us. Colonel Crabill's men were ready, and in the New York harbor a British ship was waiting to take us to her Mother Country.

WE CROSS ATLANTIC AND TRAIN IN ENGLAND

The skyscrapers of New York looked down at us as we wearily detrained on the New Jersey side of the Hudson River. We were indeed a sad looking lot, and a donkey could easily have broken down under the load which we carried. We were completely dressed in our winter clothing: long underwear, OD's, field jackets, wool knit caps and gloves, our long heavy overcoats and steel helmets. On our back was the fullest full-field ever packed. Around our waist was wound the rifle belt complete with full canteen, bayonet, first aid pouch and other attachments. Slung over the right shoulder was the gas mask. The rifle or carbine we simply carried as best we could. And last, but by far from least, that duffle bag weighing 60 or more pounds. We got to the ferry but only after much cussing and juggling.

Over the famous Hudson we went, off the ferry and up the long flight of stairs to the boat. Here an Army band greeted us along with the Red Cross do-nut and coffee units. Anyone fortunate enough to free a hand grabbed a do-nut while some overgrown G I "barker" bellowed our last names and we countered with our first name and middle initial. Carefully we made our way up the gangplank, our throats choking at the thought of leaving American soil, nevertheless a little excited in anticipation of the ocean voyage. Down below deck most of us were assigned to different sections of the ship, and that night, too tired to even gripe, we bedded on hammocks or on straw mattresses thinking how awful it was to be leaving a country so peaceful as the United States.

On April 6th, 1944, the HMS "Samaria," a British Transport quartering the 329th Infantry Regiment, pulled up its anchor. It was but one ship of many which constituted the largest convoy ever to cross the Atlantic. Our beloved ones were not there to bid us farewell, but the Statue of Liberty was as she whispered to us, "Hurry back, Soldier, and take good care of yourself."

Out at sea, for many of us this being our first ocean voyage, the dangers of the high waters annoyed us. The first few days we felt brave for the weather was warm and the sea very calm. Every morning we donned our "Mae Wests" and fell out on deck for boat drills. The "Samaria" had approximately 5000 troops aboard her and we understood well the problem of shipping so many troops to England at one time; consequently we did all within our power to make the journey as pleasant as possible for everyone concerned.

We spent Easter Sunday on mid-ocean and over 3000 men attended the Easter Services some of which were given on the open decks. Soon the sky darkened and the mist hung over us as the foamy waves came in higher and splashed the decks at random. With the rolling and dipping of the ship we easily succumbed to sea-sickness, an illness which knocked the Hell out of many of us. The English chow was our biggest gripe. As bad as it was, we were fed but twice daily; however, we supplemented this with good wholesome chocolate bars and tea biscuits obtained at the ship's canteen.

The ship knifed its way through wave after wave as we spent chilly afternoons on deck trying to understand the deep mystery of the sea.

Suddenly, after 12 long days of seeing nothing but water, someone shouted "Land!" Was this land? We hunted up our field glasses and peered anxiously over miles of ocean to the far horizon. He was right; we were rounding the northern coast of Ireland. Our journey's end was within sight, but we understood the greater and more perilous hardships ahead. We realized only too well that our first attempt toward our ultimate goal of victory had been trying, but successful.

We had griped about our living quarters aboard this ship, our food, our boring state of inactivity, even though we understood such conditions are evil necessities created only by war. But we still griped because we were soldiers, American Soldiers, filled with a restless spirit that can never die.

At Liverpool, England our ship docked. Again we picked up everything we owned, only this time we were much weaker than the time we had boarded the Hoboken Ferry. An MP at the bottom of the gangplank pushed us along, repeating over and over, "Only a 100 yards more to go." What he meant to say was a 100 yards more to go after we had reached the end of the dock, where a train was waiting for us. Nevertheless, we made it, baggage and all. A slow English train brought us, under cover of darkness to the vicinity of Wrexham, Wales.

The following morning, after a good night's sleep and a decent cup of American coffee, we marveled at the beautiful English countryside. A few days passed and we were permitted to go to the neighboring villages; most of us went to Wrexham. We all remember how difficult it was to get accustomed to the English currency — six-Pence, half penny, penny and shilling pieces; how thirst quenching the ale and beer was; and, of course, the never to-be-forgotten fish and chips.

But all wasn't rosy in England. We will never forget those weeks of tough training when we marched through swamps and climbed the highest mountains in Northern Wales. The nights were cold and we shivered under our two woolen blankets, our backs flat against the damp ground.

Our training completed, we returned to familiar grounds surrounding Wrexham. On June 6th, 1944, fellow American soldiers stormed the beaches of Normandy. We prayed to God that day, thankful that we had not been selected for that dangerous operation, but soon we were to see fighting which, in many ways, was worse than that on the beaches. Shortly after D-Day, the 83rd Infantry Division was transferred from the THIRD to the FIRST ARMY. The 329th Infantry Regiment, prepared for battle, moved out of Wrexham and headed for seaports on the southern shores of England. Our training days were over; we would soon prove to the world that the 329th was an Infantry Regiment of which our nation could be proud.

COMBAT

WE CROSS THE CHANNEL AND SEE FRANCE

We arrived at the "sausage area" outside the ports of Plymouth and Falmouth very fatigued after a day and night drive through Southern England. Here, we exchanged our English money for French invasion currency, and two clips of live ammunition were handed us, not to be used in any problem, but in readiness for an enemy — an enemy who understood nothing but death.

On Monday, the 19th of June, 1944, we boarded the vessels which would take us over the English Channel and to France. Most of the Regiment was assigned to the British Liner "Cheshire", the remainder drew Liberty Ships. We pulled out of those ports that night knowing that this was the last lap on the rough road to actual combat.

Going up on deck the next morning we were surprised to note that the convoy, instead of pointing towards France, was heading back to England; we had run into a bad sea-storm and the unloading of troops and equipment on the beaches of Normandy would be delayed. The storm died away and again the bows of our ships dipped through the choppy Channel in the direction of Normandy. To the left of us other ships were on the sea, many of which were headed in the opposite direction; hospital ships bearing bright red crosses, and empty cargo vessels returning to England for more supplies.

Our first sight of France was one which we will always remember; the thousands of ships waiting off the coast to unload troops and supplies; the hundreds of barrage balloons aimlessly floating high into the sky; the large amount of wreckage which lined the edges of the beach; the numerous shell holes and knocked out coastal defenses. All this meant one thing: the Allied Armies had suffered greatly the first few days of the War on European soil, but thereafter nothing would ever stop us from waging total destruction against the German Army, no matter how powerful it might be.

The afternoon of the 23rd, we grappled with the rope ladders descending heavily into the LST's. On these, we were soon ferried to the blood-spotted shores of Normandy. We were on French soil! France which at one time had been so gay and so beautiful but which had nothing but hidden dangers and mourning for us. Moving past the shores, our heads bent as we saw freshly dug graves with their immaculate white crosses just recently planted into the soft ground, again we prayed to God. Our prayers may have varied a little but we all thought of the grief-stricken families of those dead men, and of our own families back home.

We moved inland and assembled the Regiment in the vicinity of Bricqueville, and there, gladly dug our fox-holes under a tree or up against the embankment of a hedgerow. The following morning we were more than glad that we had slept in them, for enemy planes had come over during the night and bombed the landing sites on the Beach.

On June the 28th we left the assembly area, and marched through the recently taken town of Carentan on our way to relieve elements of the 101st Airborne Division. The 1st Battalion was given the mission of protecting the town of Carentan; the remainder of the Regiment was placed in Division Reserve.

In the days that followed, even our own artillery made us jump at first, for the enemy artillery was almost negligible. We opened our ears to any rumor that floated around the company; snipers were everywhere, the Division on our left was badly beaten in a severe enemy counterattack. We wanted so much to know what was actually happening and yet few people ever told us anything. We would soon find out, the hard way.

How many of the following are true?

WE FIGHT THROUGH THE HEDGEROWS OF NORMANDY

The 4th of July, 1944, will always live in our memories, especially in the ones of our 2nd Battalion. Men who now live and participated in this initial attack of the 329th Infantry Regiment on that day, will long argue the soundness of the decision to employ but one battalion in this operation. But then, we were new at this game and we would unfortunately learn that only through blood, death, fear, and relentless days and nights of fighting could any step towards victory be attained.

On that day, the 83rd Division, as part of the VII Corps attacked south of the town of Carentan with the 330th on the left, the 331st in the middle, and our 2nd Battalion on the right of the Division sector. Lt Colonel Bowen's men jumped off to the attack at 0445, after a long artillery preparation. The terrain facing E and F, the two leading companies, consisted of nothing but the hedgerows so typical of Normandy. In addition to these hedgerows the battalion was confronted by a swamp over which it would have to move before reaching their initial objective. The enemy held the commanding ground overlooking the swamp and our positions; he possessed every favorable factor.

Companies E and F moved out, it was soon after that they tasted their first enemy artillery. Continuous heavy concentrations kept falling around them. As they neared the approaches to the swamp they received an enormous amount of heavy mortar shells; heavy machine guns opened up on them, and small arms fire literally filled the air. Those who attempted to cross the swamp were either killed or left to bleed in the waist-deep marsh; few returned. Leaders and non-coms died gallantly in trying to lead their men to an almost impossible objective. The battalion, completely disorganized and badly chewed up, withdrew to a position along a draw between hedgerows and remained in that location until July the 6th. This was war. According to later G-2 reports the 2nd Battalion had made this attack against much superior forces, but the white battalion knew that as soon as they had jumped off.

The following day our regimental sector was changed and we were given a new zone of action; we would attack south along the left side of the Carentan-Periers highway with the 3rd Battalion leading. Here are incidents and messages extracted from the 329th Journal sheets, dated — 5 July 1944.

- 0030 — We continue attack early tomorrow morning. (CG 83rd)

On that day the 3rd Battalion drove 2500 meters through thick hedgerow defenses to reach the outskirts of the town of Culot, and although heavily counterattacked by SS troops throughout the night held their positions in face of heavy fire.

On the 6th day, the 1st Battalion fought savagely against Jerry tanks and Infantry who tried desperately to halt the advance of our men. By 1245, the 1st had driven up to the 3rd Battalion and took up positions formerly held by them. While holding this line they received two vicious enemy attacks. Mortar and artillery fire was very heavy all during the day and increased in amount while the enemy tried to dislodge us. The following morning the 1st Battalion attacked and gained 4 or 5 hedgerows against fanatical resistance. The 3rd Battalion was held up by a tank and infantry attack, but after repelling this German assault the unit moved up on line with the 1st Battalion to its left. The 2nd Battalion sent elements to both the right and left flanks of the regimental sector to strengthen these positions against more enemy counterattacks.

We began to feel the loss of our dead and wounded for casualties were mounting rapidly. We wondered if every day of combat on this Continent would be as terrible as those we had just fought. With hidden tears we hardened at the sight of our buddies lying dead along the embankments of the hedges. We cursed aloud as brave Medics and litter bearers carried moaning soldiers with limbs torn off, and others with loose flesh staining the stretchers red. We refused many meals, for the sight and smell of decaying human flesh and cattle was simply too much for our nervous stomachs. We spent long sleepless nights, our bodies hugging the ground of foxholes, as shells whistled and lighted nearby, rocking and shaking the earth beside us. Was it possible for a man to live through all of this? — we wondered when our turn would come. We cried to all known powers that someday the German race would suffer tenfold for all the suffering and human sacrifices we were enduring.

On the 8th day of July the 22nd Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Division relieved us and the entire 329th was placed in an assembly area close to the front as Division reserve. This relief did not, however, relieve our nervous state of mind for the enemy continually pounded the fields in which we had assembled. We received 365 enlisted men and 20 Officers as reinforcements. That night, although we were in reserve, every unit of the Regiment received an excessive amount of artillery concentrations. The Germans apparently had every field and hedgerow zeroed in, because the shelling was uncannily accurate; up and down the hedges they landed, exactly where we had our holes dug. We later learned that the regiment as a whole had suffered greatly that night in men killed and wounded; some men were found in foxholes blown beyond recognition. We spent the next day well crouched in the holes and wrote our first letters home since the beginning of our fight.

From the 9th to the 13th, the fiercest fighting of the war for the 329th took place, consisting of numerous assaults on fortified hedgerows with skillfully placed machine guns cross-firing over the hedged-in fields. These machine gun nests and entrenchments were not only set up behind the hedgerows but also well hidden beneath them. The enemy had every field zeroed in with accurate artillery and mortar fire whenever he needed it. But, strangely enough, we plugged along wresting one or two hedgerows a day. We didn't know it at the time, but we were really weakening a stubborn foe; we were actually wearing down such battle experienced German die-hards as the 17th SS Panzer Division. And after uninterrupted attacks and undying energy by our men, he would finally become exhausted and beaten.

In this period of time we advanced to a point several hundred yards beyond the town of Sainteny. The 3rd Battalion, after days of attacking, finally captured the famed "Orchard 15" from an obstinate German force. Our casualties were still heavy and we received more reinforcements. But we kept going, fighting for limited objectives day after day, and gaining them. Not enough praise can be given our own Cannon Company and 322nd Field which supported us and on many occasions saved the day for us. On about the 18th the 329th Regiment went into defensive positions to hold the ground taken. A now famous armored division came in on our right; the enemy, sensing a new outfit on line, went to work on it. For two nights straight it sent raiding parties through their lines with the intention of obtaining prisoners; the enemy accomplished this mission in addition to playing hell with our right flank.

We held these defensive positions until the great breakthrough on the 25th. In the days that followed we chased the fast retreating enemy across the Taute River, over the St Lo-Periers highway, and down to the vicinity of the town of Fougères. Here, the 329th Infantry Regiment gathered into an assembly area and made very good use of the few days of rest afforded us. Our morale was lifted considerably upon hearing reports that American armor was swiftly advancing across the vast French plains. That first campaign for the 329th "Buckshot" Regiment was in all respects its toughest. We won the battle of Normandy in one respect; in another, considering the high price in American lives, we lost.

WE FORCE VON AULOCK FROM THE CITADEL

When we left the bloody Hedgerows of Normandy, we also left behind the bravest infantrymen this Regiment has ever known. These men, very close to us, at Atterbury and Breckinridge, and through all our training, died in the opening stages of the War. We will never forget them, nor their conspicuous gallantry in the face of furious resistance, they are the real heroes, to whom we owe much.

On the 3rd of August the Regiment moved approximately 75 miles to the vicinity of Pontorson, Brittany. We were not accustomed to such a long move after weeks of gaining nothing more than one or two hedgerows a day, and the sight of beautiful French girls lining the towns of Avranches, and Sartilly opened our eyes; it was like coming out of darkness into daylight. Whenever the convoy stopped for a ten minute break, children swarmed over our jeeps and trucks and begged us for "Chocolat" "bon bon" "chew gum". They threw flowers at us and handed us bottles of their most delicate French wines. We were their "liberators," and we liked it.

The 83rd Infantry Division was given the mission of clearing the enemy, estimated at 15,000 in number, from the St Malo Peninsula. At 0800 on the 4th, the "Buckshot" Regiment started moving by motor and foot west to the vicinity of Epiniac and the movement was continued by shuttling troops northwest to Miniac. All three Battalions went into assigned assembly areas and waited their attack orders. Finally the 2nd Battalion was given the mission of driving north, taking the town of Dolet and proceeding on to the heavily defended town of Chateauneuf. The 1st prepared to join the attack after the 2nd Battalion jumped off; and the 3rd Battalion remained in Regimental reserve.

At 1930 that night, the 2nd Battalion jumped off. They were cautious at first and moved slowly, but by 2200 they had taken Dolet and were still advancing. Our G-2 "info" was suddenly supplemented by scores of Frenchmen who had before our arrival, worked on fortifications which now lay in our path. These earnest Frenchmen gave us valuable information even though they did shout; "blockhos" — (pillbox), "char" — (tank) or "mitrailleur" — (machine gun) here, there and everywhere, and at times, had us very confused.

The following morning at 0830 the regiment attacked with both 1st and 2nd Battalions in the leading echelon. One hour later companies "E", "F", and "G" were over 600 yards beyond Dolet meeting moderate resistance. Companies "A" and "B", followed closely by "C", advanced north on the 2nd Battalion's left flank. The 3rd Battalion was alerted for movement, and things began to roll. The "Buckshot" Regiment was on the attack, shooting and marching, and moving fast. This was the way to fight a War.

The assault on Chateauneuf began with tanks and infantry moving out under artillery barrages which preceded the attack. Two 2nd Battalion Commanders were lost in the attack and when Captain Sharpe, just returning from the hospital, arrived at the Regimental CP, he was given command of the Battalion. After a hard fight the 2nd Battalion entered Chateauneuf despite the heavy volume of artillery and direct fire which came from the fortress on the high ground just north of the town. Major Speedie's men were sent through the town and swung by the 2nd Battalion, driving to a point 3 miles southeast of St Servan, the Regimental objective. Meanwhile the doughs of the 1st Battalion had overcome the resistance which had held them up and had taken Hill 51; and the 2nd Battalion reduced the strong-point north of Chateauneuf taking many of the enemy in our first real haul of prisoners. At 2230, the Battalions were told to button up for the night, and the order was a welcome one.

At 0900 on the 6th of August, the 1st and 3rd Battalions moved up closer to St Servan meeting slight opposition. The 2nd Battalion also moved up, being held in reserve for the time when the attack was to be renewed. At 1500, the 1st and 3rd Battalions attacked towards St Servan making good progress until Lt. Colonel Cook's doughboys met heavy fire coming from the town of La Bouralais. Major Speedie's doughs continued the attack making good progress against the strongly fortified St Joseph Hill until the Regimental boundaries were changed. This change in boundaries meant that the 3rd Battalion, which was on the right, was made to pass to the south of the Hill instead of taking it. This move placed them under heavy fire from the Hill and prevented the men from moving for quite some time. The Regiment held up for the night, organized for an all around defense and patrolled to the front in preparation for the launching of a "vicious" attack at dawn.

The "vicious" attack never materialized for the 3rd Battalion remained in place all day pinned down by heavy enemy fire from St Joseph Hill. Enemy troops came in on their flanks and played hell with them until company "C" from the 1st Battalion maneuvered into position and wiped out the threat. The 1st Battalion during the day advanced and took the town of La Bouralais.

On August 9th the attack was resumed, and the 3rd Battalion advanced through the city of St Servan after a bitter battle. Lt. Col. Cook and his Battalion left company "B" in the town of La Balue to reduce one remaining pillbox there, and then advanced northwest towards St Servan and made contact with the left flank of the 3rd Battalion in the southern section of the city. Back at La Balue, the pillbox was shelled for hours with several hundred rounds from A-T guns. Finally at 1345, the pillbox surrendered. The 2nd Battalion, still in reserve, sent out patrols and cleaned up small pockets of resistance left behind by the other two Battalions. Sharpe's men were then put in Division reserve and moved during the night by trucks to the vicinity of St Coutombe for a separate operation against Fort de la Varde.

The only opposition then remaining in the Regimental sector was the Citadel, a strongly fortified position situated on a peninsula a half mile from St Servan. An effort was made to get the Citadel to surrender but the enemy refused to do so.

On the 11th, an attack was planned on the Citadel, to be preceded first by a bombing mission and then by an artillery preparation following the bombing. The bombers came over and released their screaming sticks over the fortress. The artillery paged the concrete structure and the infantry followed the barrages. Elements of the 1st and 3rd Battalions, Speedie's men on the right, started the attack at 2040. They reached the fort but were unable to get over its walls, even though pole charges, bangalore torpedoes, and flame throwers were used. The attacking forces received heavy fire from the Island of Cezembre, still held by the enemy, 3 miles to the northwest and also from automatic mortars and weapons located within the walls of the fort. There wasn't one foot of land or water around that Citadel which wasn't covered by enemy fire. Our forces, unable to penetrate the fort, were ordered to withdraw to their former positions in St Servan.

The following day, the results of the previous attack on the Citadel were discussed. French civilians and German prisoners gave us all the information they knew relating to the Citadel. With this information Colonel Crabill and his Staff made plans for a second attack on the Citadel, if such an attack were ordered by higher headquarters. The plan called for two assault teams of 96 men each; each assault team to be composed of two demolition groups. The Battalions received this plan and studied it carefully, while towed guns of a TD Battalion were brought up and placed in position to supplement the fire of our own 57's on the Citadel.

On the 13th, Captain Sharpe's men were assigned the task of attacking Fort de la Varde, a strongly fortified position on a small peninsula 3 miles northeast of St Malo. The attack was brilliantly commanded and executed in a matter of hours. With the aid of a sound truck, Captain Sharpe issued verbal orders to his men on the field during the whole attack and when orders were not being transmitted he played records of victory marches. Reaching the Fort, Sharpe's men stormed it, Indian-style, screaming, "Haba, haba, haba". Fort de la Varde capitulated and 197 prisoners and vast stocks of equipment and food fell into our hands.

Day after day, squadrons of bombers dropped tons of bombs on the Citadel; the artillery pounded it from every conceivable angle; even those immense 8-inch Corps Artillery guns were brought up within 1000 yards of the Fort and fired point blank at it. The 3-inch towed TD's fired hundreds of rounds of armor piercing ammunition with no visible effect. Meanwhile the 2nd Battalion attacked the Island of la Grande Bey, during the low tide; after this effort over 150 prisoners and more equipment were taken without a shot being fired.

Finally on August 17th, at 1420 someone reported that a white flag was flying over the Citadel and that a few of the enemy had started to leave the Fort. Overhead, flights of P-38's with "jelled gasoline" bombs hummed; we immediately called off the scheduled bombing mission and told the pilots to drop their loads on the Isle de Cezembre instead. However, the information did not get to the planes in time and one of them swooped low over the Fort, dropped the bomb and strafed the area. Two officers who had gone out to arrange surrender terms managed to get an orange panel just as another pilot was coming in to do his job; the pilot saw the signal on the ground, flew by harmlessly, and rejoined his squadron.

Col. Von Aulock, the mad man of the Citadel, as he was called by the civilians, with his garrison of 595 men marched to our PW cages and two days later we left the St Malo Peninsula still under fire from enemy artillery pieces located on the Isle of Cezembre.

WE LIVE LOVE AND LIBERATE IN THE LOIRE VALLEY

We left the St. Malo peninsula and moved by motor to the historic old city of Angers, charged with the defense of the city and the northern bank of the beautiful Loire River. The new mission of the 329th Regiment was to police and defend the city of Angers and vicinity so as to prevent infiltration by the enemy to the north of the Loire River. Our sector extended gradually from Champtoce on the right to an undetermined point on the East; as far east as patrolling would permit, there being no friendly forces on our left flank. The 1st Battalion received an area southwest of Angers; the 2nd Battalion an area southeast of the City; while the 3rd Battalion, in reserve, occupied and policed the city and its suburbs.

On the night of the 20th of August the enemy became aggressive for the first time in our new sector. A strong German patrol crossed the Loire River and occupied the Angers water works, located at Pont de Ce, 3 miles south of the City. The following morning Company "E" from the 2nd Battalion attacked the German-held position and drove the enemy away from the water works after a brisk skirmish. After that the only enemy action came from small patrols which crossed the river, but quickly returned to the other side the minute a "Buckshooter" appeared.

Whenever we weren't out on outpost along the river, or footpatrolling the streets of Angers, we lived in comfortable homes or Chateaux; of course, all depending on the situation of our particular company. Here we were given some hours of leisure, and we, who were usually fighting up front, stacked our rifles and put aside our grenades and trench knives. We spent mornings pressing our OD trousers; some of us even bathed and most of us shaved daily. The sweetest smelling lotions were taken from the bottom of our duffle bags; stripes were sewn; and the Good Conduct and other awards were neatly placed over our left pockets. Our Combat Infantry Badges took a beating with "Blitz"; and our combat shoes glistened with wax. We amassed all the chocolate bars and chewing gum we had handy for this big occasion, because we were to receive our first nightly passes since England. On pass in Angers, we took out our French-English dictionaries and did our best to converse with the pretty girls. We walked through the strange streets, and stopped at a cafe to order some "Vin Blanc," or if we had not lost most of our month's pay gambling, we sportingly asked for "Champagne 1921, Monsieur."

By August 27th, the sektor of defense for the Regiment had stretched to 130 miles, from a point west of Angers to the city of Orleans. The 2nd Battalion remained in the sector around Angers for the defense of the Champtoce-Saumur area. The 3rd Battalion moved by motor a distance of over 80 miles to an area southeast of Chateau Renault; while the 1st Battalion remained in an assembly area near Bauge as the Regimental reserve. The I & R Platoon received the mission of patrolling the vast area between the cities of Blois and Orleans along the Loire River. About August 30th, reports from the FFI warned us that the enemy forces south of the river were beginning a general withdrawal to the east.

On the 7th of September the fast-riding I & R Platoon sent one motorized squad across the Loire River in the vicinity of Mer. Advancing cautiously they contacted a force from the FFI and joined them in the chase of the retreating German troops. At 2350 the snoopers sent back a message declaring that an enemy force of 20,000 Krauts wanted to surrender to the American Army. In the days that followed surrender terms were worked out, and on September 16th - 17th, General Elster, Commander of the German forces south of the Loire River, surrendered his Staff and 19,854 troops to our Division Commander, General Macon. This amazing PWgrab skyrocketed our prisoner of war total to the outstanding number of 23,270 since Normandy.

Our Regimental sector was then pushed over to extend from Blois to Auxerre. On the 22nd the 329th Infantry Regiment was ordered to concentrate in and around Orleans, in preparation for a move across northeastern France to another European country — Luxembourg.

WE CLEAR THE ENEMY FROM LUXEMBOURG

On the night of the 23rd of September we streamed on to the roads leading north and out of the country of France into the small but beautiful country of Luxembourg. After a move of over 300 miles we closed into an assembly area near the city of Luxembourg. We were now attached to the THIRD Army, with the mission of protecting the left flank of Patton's Army; and of preventing enemy patrols from penetrating our sector. We would also vigorously patrol to the line of the Moselle-Sauer Rivers. Our sector extended along these two rivers from the town of Ahn, on the south, to the resort town of Echternach. Our left boundary, also the left boundary of the THIRD Army, ran along a line from Echternach to the city of Luxembourg. The enemy held several bridgeheads across these two rivers in our sector and enemy patrols of considerable strength had been reported very active.

On the morning of the 25th we moved out of our assembly area and relieved the elements of other units in our new sector. The 329th Regiment was disposed as follows: The 1st Battalion on the right, the 2nd Battalion on the left and the 3rd Battalion held in reserve. Colonel Crabill decided to hold all of his companies intact so that they could be readily shifted to any part of the wide sector in case of enemy counterattacks. Instead of posting a number of small patrols, combat patrols would be sent out on missions and made to return, upon the completion of their missions, to their respective units. The I&R Platoon was given the mission of patrolling our left flank and of maintaining contact with elements of the FIRST Army; the 3rd Battalion, in turn, would send out patrols to maintain contact on our right with the 331st Infantry Regiment.

We started out this new mission by carefully edging forward towards the Moselle and Sauer Rivers. Our combat patrols, working to the front, ran into enemy patrols and after several fierce skirmishes the Jerries were driven back. Soon, our supporting artillery was within reach of the much heralded Siegfried Line, which lay boldly on the eastern banks of these two rivers.

The month of September ended with numerous enemy patrols encountered in both 1st and 2nd Battalions' sectors; Company B occupied the towns of Oberdonvan and Niederdonvan, and Company A prepared an attack on the enemy-held town of Grevenmacher.

On the first day of October, Company A started the attack towards Grevenmacher. They encountered small arms fire, artillery fire, mines and booby-traps, and heavily defended road blocks, but by nightfall the hard fighting doughs had occupied a part of the objective. Due to the fact that the town was, in itself, unimportant, and the men were receiving intense enemy artillery and mortar fire there, they were ordered to withdraw during the night to high ground dominating the town. Also on that day, a reinforced platoon of Company I, totalling about 80 men, moved out toward a woods directly west of Echternach. This over-sized platoon swept through the woods, routed a few of the enemy hidden in dugouts, and reached a point within 1 mile of Echternach without sustaining one casualty. Later that evening, Company L was sent up to reinforce that platoon of Company I in preparation for an attack on the town of Echternach the following morning.

We did not bother with the towns of Grevenmacher and Echternach the next day but outwitted the enemy by playing hell with their movement

It all started when Company I, very alert, discovered a 20 man enemy outpost along the road to Echternach, and with a swift maneuver pounced upon the outpost killing or capturing all of the surprised victims. Our men did not go into the town of Echternach but remained atop the high ground which commanded the town. Company L was then brought back to the 3rd Battalion's rear to increase the Regimental reserve. Company A occupied and continued to hold the high terrain to the west of Grevenmacher. The eagle-eyed doughs of Lt. Colonel Sharpe's outfit spotted a troop-train overloaded with Jerries across the river from Wasserbillig, and immediately called for concentrations by the 322nd Field Artillery Battalion. A few watchful P-47's hovering about the area also spotted the doomed train, and dove swiftly dropping their bombs on it. Instantly, the Germans smoked the area surrounding the train, and the damage, undoubtedly heavy, could not be observed.

The main activity for the next few days was continued patrol incursions, but no serious threat developed while the Regiment held its sector of almost 25 miles of the west bank of the Moselle and Sauer Rivers.

On the 7th of October, at 1600, the town of Echternach was bombed in preparation for an attack. The bombing was then followed by a heavy artillery barrage, and infantrymen of K Company, with two platoons of tanks attached, went in with guns firing; within the short time of an hour they had reached the center of the town. Here they were met by approximately 2 German companies, plus a machine gun platoon; besides this human resistance, the enemy threw in all the artillery and mortar fire he possessed from across the river. After a few of the initial strongpoints were eliminated the enemy fortunately withdrew to the eastern bank before Speedie's men had a chance to engage them in hand to hand combat. Meanwhile, Company C cautiously walked into the town of Grevenmacher and occupied it.

For several days the only activity taking place was patrolling throughout the 329th Combat Team's sector and the firing of harassing missions upon miscellaneous targets on the east side of the rivers by our artillery. The 83rd Division reverted to the control of the NINTH Army, so our left boundary merely became the boundary between us and the 8th Infantry Division. This was our fifth change in Armies: we crossed the English Channel as part of the THIRD Army; during the hard fighting of Normandy we belonged to the FIRST Army; moving up the St Malo peninsula we were again part of the THIRD; we defended the Loire River as part of the new NINTH Army and now in Luxembourg this change from the THIRD to the NINTH again, made it our fifth one.

Due to the fact that this situation in Luxembourg became comparatively static, the 329th "Buckshot" Infantry Regiment started on a definite and planned program of training. We had received many reinforcements since landing in France, and the type of fighting done by the "Buckshot" Regiment in the tricky hedgerows had been quite different from the tactics learned previously in the United States. Now that the bloody hedgerows were in back of us, it was necessary to review the old basic principles. A schedule whereby all troops could be rotated from their outposts and patrolling was planned so that every man received the training.

Here, too, we witnessed the launching from Germany, of those destructive rockets, V-Bombs. Every clear day, we saw several of the V-2 type streak the sky and rapidly disappear. With binoculars, if we were 'on the ball', we could catch more of its detail, such as, the fiery red ball climbing high into the sky followed by a long streak of white smoke. The rocket would then lose its power of ascent and straighten out on its devastating mission. The shorter-ranged V-1 rocket also put in its appearance; however, not as regularly as the V-2, but with a better psychological effect as it sputtered and zoomed by.

On the other side of the Moselle, nearly every day our OP's detected several trains pulling into Kons Karthaus. Several heavy bombing missions were carried out on this train activity and in the days that followed fewer trains were observed. A Psychological Warfare Team, with a loudspeaker system, was used to encourage desertion in the German Army. The artillery also sent over propaganda leaflets, and although our PW cages did not become over-crowded, we kept our team of interrogators fairly busy.

Towards the end of October, a battalion was sent to the vicinity of Hettange Grande for training against the fortified Maginot Line. In due time all three battalions had received this training; we were then preparing for the Siegfried Line should our Regiment ever be called upon for such a mission.

During the month of November our sector changed several times but not enough so as to warrant an entire new change in our defense; the battalions were rotated for the Regimental reserve position and training continued. During this period, there was also very little activity and even enemy patrolling was scarce. But it wasn't all work and no play. Red Cross do-nut and coffee wagons came to us; they probably weren't the prettiest girls who ever fed us do-nuts and coffee, but they were Americans, and we talked and laughed with them. There were also plenty of movies and USO shows around the area. We received passes to the city of Luxembourg, there we bought dish after dish of ice cream, a favorite fancy of ours which we hadn't tasted since the "good ol'" States. All in all, we had a fairly good time, and enjoyed some well-earned freedom and laughter.

On Thanksgiving Day, we sat down to a meal, reminiscent of the turkey dinners back home. Everything was on hand, from the white tablecloth to the cranberry sauce. We thanked God that we had come this far, and added, that we would be more than thankful should we be able to live to spend the next Thanksgiving Day.

On December the 9th, the 12th Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Division relieved us. They had been engaged in some of the toughest fighting that this war had produced — the Hurtgen Forest. We talked with them before leaving, attempting to discover a few pointers on woods fighting. We knew how it should be done according to the book, but getting it straight from a man who had just been through it, satisfied our curiosity much better. We would soon be in the treacherous woods of the Hurtgen Forest; another campaign of hard fighting and blood spilling.

WE ENTER GERMANY — HURTGEN FOREST TO ROER RIVER

We crossed the German Frontier on December the 10th, 1944, and relieved the 8th Infantry Regiment in the Hurtgen Forest. This new move by the 329th Infantry Regiment changed us from the VIII Corps to the VII Corps. It also gave us a heavily wooded sector lying midway between the town of Gressinich, to the rear, and the city of Duren, 7 kilometers to our front. Such crack divisions as the 1st and 4th Infantry Divisions had been fighting since November the 11th to clear the enemy from the Hurtgen Forest. Their main obstacles, and they were tough ones, had been the fanatical stand staged by die-hard SS troops; the extensive mine belts and booby-trapped trees, all part of the inner Siegfried Line; the heavy concentrations of artillery and mortar fire causing tree bursts to send hot shrapnel into many of the men thus inflicting heavy casualties; and the bad weather with constant rain and poor drainage which caused a high rate of non-battle casualties. We gloomingly took these tough battle conditions upon ourselves and shook our heads saying solemnly, "C'est la guerre".

The 329th Infantry Regiment was given the left sector of the 83rd Division, with the 4th Cavalry Group on our right. Future operational plans called for the pinching out of this cavalry, after which time the 331st Infantry Regiment would become the unit on our right. The 9th Infantry Division was in the process of relieving the 1st Division, and it was estimated that this relief would be completed by the time the 329th had taken over its new positions; they would then be on our left flank. Two battalions were placed on line; the 2nd on the left and the 1st on the right of our regimental sector, the 3rd Battalion was held back in reserve.

Shelter consisted entirely of log huts and dugouts built over a period of one to two weeks by the former units in the forest. We built more log cabins and improved those left to us until these primitive dwellings provided us with sufficient cover; but they were still poor, from the standpoint of comfort. The narrow roads with a thick, knee-deep layer of mud made the going tough for our vehicles. Would this Hurtgen Forest campaign be another bitter and bloody slugging match?

The 329th Infantry Regiment jumped off to the attack at 1000, December 12th, in an attempt to reach the edge of the Hurtgen Forest and close up on the Roer River. The objective for this day's operation was a north-south line running through Hof Hardt, a stop along the road consisting of three houses. Lt. Col. Cook's doughs from B Company moved quickly through entrenched enemy but Company C was temporarily held up by a strongpoint. They flanked the strongpoint and moved forward fighting and marching; by 1700 the 1st Battalion was on its objective. The spirited 2nd Battalion started its ball rolling when F Company, displaying great courage, rushed five machine gun nests with heavy rifle fire and rapid movement and, as a result, overran them. Company G followed a rolling mortar and artillery barrage and occupied the town of Hof Hardt after they, too, had overrun a couple of machine gun nests. Our troops dug in well that night but received an almost continuous artillery pasting until morning.

The following days of the 13th and 14th saw a series of brilliant attacks against the towns of Gurzenich and Birgel. On the 13th our attack toward the Roer River was continued with the 1st and 2nd Battalions jumping off at 0800, and the 3rd Battalion at 0830. Major Sharpe's Battalion, still on the left, attacked with F and G Companies, the men from G making the main effort on the right. The terrain to the front of G Company was still partly wooded all the way up to Gurzenich, but the men moved rapidly, overcame all the resistance and entered the town. F Company swung to the right and followed G, E Company followed F; and everything the 2nd Battalion had, just poured into that little part of Gurzenich. By 1700 they were half way through the town; settled down and prepared to hold these positions for the night. The 1st Battalion attacked in their densely wooded sector on the right; this, plus the encountering of strong resistance, made movement slow, but by 1710, both Companies A and B had fought their way through the woods and to the edge of Gurzenich, slightly to the right of the point where Sharpe's men had entered the town. They also held these positions for the night. The 3rd Battalion was immediately held up by stiff resistance. L Company was held in place while I Company swept around it. Both companies then advanced several hundred yards fighting against some of the strongest enemy positions encountered during the day. Company A of the 308th Engineer Battalion, spent the whole night clearing the only supply route in our sector. Road mines were extremely difficult to find beneath the heavy mud and a few vehicles attempting to go forward from Hof Hardt were knocked out. By early morning the engineers had swept the whole road so that tanks could be rushed to the 2nd Battalion in Gurzenich.

The next day, the 14th, the 3rd Battalion was given the mission of taking the town of Birgel. The area between the battalion's present position and Birgel was wooded to within 500 yards of the town; the terrain from the edge of the woods to Birgel being wide open fields. Very little resistance was met while advancing to the edge of the woods and at 1430, Lt. Colonel Speedie's fighters jumped off. At the same time that the artillery was smoking the town, I and K Companies advanced using, in the words of Lt. Colonel Speedie, "the most beautiful and perfectly executed marching fire ever witnessed". We were out of the Forest!

And although they met very heavy small arms and mortar fire, the momentum of their rapid marching and firing, took them into the town of Birgel in the record time of 20 minutes. Peculiarly enough, L Company, sitting back in the woods in reserve, received as many casualties as the attacking companies, due to tree bursts. However, our total casualties were surprisingly light, due to the lightning advances we made coming out of the Hurtgen Forest. The 2nd Battalion spent the day clearing the remainder of the town of Gurzenich; and after flushing a large number of Jerries from the cellars of the buildings they had all of the town clear except a small section to the northeast. About 1700 both battalions reported strong enemy counterattacks by tanks and infantry in their respective towns. The 329th Infantry Regiment which had never been driven back by any enemy attack, fought back these futile attempts, and the attacking enemy forces suffered heavy losses as he abandoned the thought of further engaging the 329th that night. Later on, B Company was attached to the 2nd Battalion to strengthen the defenses of the town of Gurzenich, and protect the right and rear of E and G Companies.

On the 15th, the enemy had not recuperated from the terrific beating we had handed him the night before; nevertheless, we knew him to be very tricky, and prepared for his further assaults. The 2nd and 3rd Battalions both spent the day consolidating their positions and reducing enemy pockets remaining in their sectors.

The 16th of December will be a day long remembered for every fighting soldier on the Western Front — Von Rundstedt's great offensive began. Although the German Army's plan of penetration was farther south, the enemy facing us launched fierce counterattacks all morning long against the towns of Gurzenich and Birgel. He came in with both tanks and infantry, supported by heavy and constant artillery fire. We engaged them unhesitatingly and with a much better fighting morale. Germans infiltrated everywhere and powerful enemy tanks fired point blank into buildings from which we defended. With our bazookas, M-1's, BAR's and machine guns we returned the fire; hunted down the infiltrators and after a real hard battle, we successfully repulsed the attacks. The 329th Infantry Regiment had stood its ground again.

And now a little explanation on one of the most brilliant maneuvers ever planned by a regimental commander; the plan which Colonel "Buckshot" Crabill mapped out for an attack on the important town of Rolsdorf. The town of Birgel lay about a mile to the south of Gurzenich, that is, one mile from the southern end of Gurzenich to the northern end of Birgel. This left a considerable space between our battalion flanks, but the 1st Battalion in the southern part of Gurzenich, was able to control the central open space between these two towns by fire in the daytime and by patrols at night. This town of Rolsdorf formed a triangle with the above mentioned two. This triangle was dangerous, open and flat ground. The enemy MLR, as far as we could determine extended through the "triangle" where over 200 enemy were entrenched. The Germans probably thought, after they had lost Gurzenich and Birgel, that we would follow through with a frontal attack across the "triangle" to Rolsdorf, for here they were prepared and waiting to make it a costly attack. Colonel Crabill had other plans.

At 0740 on December the 17th, E and F Companies attacked from the north end of Gurzenich east towards the Roer River along an east-west road; E Company astride the road and F Company to the left of it. Ten minutes later, the 1st Battalion, which had moved up unnoticed during the night and were now at the northern end of the town, sent C Company to follow E Company. An intersection with a north and south road from Rolsdorf was soon reached, and C Company, now on its own, swung south to attack the important town. As C jumped off in the new direction, B Company, which had waited in the northern half of Gurzenich, with a platoon of tanks, started out in a southeastern direction across the northern part of the "triangle". Infantrymen rode on the tanks as they streamed across the open ground, outflanking the German entrenchments. The enemy tried desperately to pivot its positions, and although they partly succeeded in laying down a base of small arms fire, we moved too rapidly for them to do much damage. The German MLR was now to our rear, in a very critical position, we all agreed. The tank riding doughs from B Company later joined C Company in Rolsdorf, and A Company came in, following C's previous route. All three rifle companies cleared the town of enemy in a very short time.

The squeeze on the enemy trapped in the center of the "triangle" came next. Lt. Colonel Speedie sent K Company from Birgel, attacking northeast towards the town of Rolsdorf. After their advance had been stopped by direct fire and heavy small arms from the frantic men holding the doomed MLR, B Company mounted their tanks again and struck from the rear, advancing out of Rolsdorf. The enemy, very confused and outsmarted by this one-two knock out punch of the "Buckshooters", came out of the trenches, hands well raised into the air, and surrendered.

The 329th "Buckshot" Regiment was proud as a peacock after these three brilliant operations; each Battalion having taken part, and each one playing the leading role in their attacks on the towns of Gurzenich, Birgel, and Rolsdorf. We had swiftly fought our way out of the death-trapped Hurtgen Forest and were now resting on the eastern bank of the Roer River, VII Corps objective.

The following day, December the 18th, Company A sent the first American patrol across the Roer River into the town of Duren. We later learned that this penetration of German soil was the deepest one made in Germany by any American force during the year of 1944.

Reports and rumors were wild on the extent of damage and advance that Von Rundstedt's Offensive was creating; so when the time came for relief along the Roer River, we knew only too well that soon the 329th would be sent to help contain the enemy and eventually push him back.

WE FIGHT AND FREEZE IN THE BATTLE OF THE BULGE

The 23rd of December brought us relief from the Roer River sector by the 414th Infantry Regiment of the 104th Division. The 329th was given the new and welcome mission of moving to the vicinity of Aachen, as the NINTH Army reserve. On Christmas day, a large turkey dinner was enjoyed by all of us. We sent a reconnaissance party to the 78th Infantry Division sector; this, however, turned out to be a waste of time. Early that evening General Macon informed Colonel Crabill that he should have the Regiment alerted for a move to the FIRST Army sector the next morning. Our stay around Aachen had been pleasant but short.

By noon of the following day we had left Germany and crossed the border into Belgium. Just what our next mission was to be, we did not know. We did know that our job would have something to do with stopping or cutting off the big German penetration which had been made across Luxembourg and southern Belgium. In spite of the confused orders given us, we closed into an assembly area in the vicinity of the town of Havelange, Belgium late that night, after a move of over 65 miles.

It was here that Winter sneaked in on us, and its debut was in all respects a cold one. We kept our overcoats well buttoned and some of us, finding the nights very cold, even slept in them. Our feet began to chill, and our toes tingled and became numb. Snow fell and left its proverbial white blanket, unmarred but for shell holes with their irregular, darkened chunks of earth.

Early in the morning of the 27th, the battalions made reconnaissance for forward assembly areas. The 83rd Recon Troop, attached to us, preceded the battalions to make sure that the areas were clear of enemy. At 1100 we started moving forward in the following order: The 1st Battalion on its way to Buissonville, on the right; the 2nd Battalion en route to Serinchamps, to the left rear of the 1st; and the 3rd Battalion headed for the town of Hogne, to the left rear of the 2nd. Cannon Company supported by the 322nd Field Artillery Battalion followed the doughboys closely and set up its guns directly behind the 2nd Battalion. By 1800 the 1st and 2nd Battalions had occupied the towns of Buissonville and Serinchamps, respectively. The 3rd Battalion after occupying Hogne, started off for the town of Humain, advancing astride a road in a column of companies. Elements of the 2nd Armored Division were fighting in and around Humain. Later on, Speedie's men took it over from the Armor. Other 2nd Armored elements out in front of our 1st Battalion were attacking south towards the town of Rochefort. Then Lt. Colonel Cook's Battalion was ordered to take over the town of Rochefort after the Armor had gained the objective; the Armor fought long into the night, but the objective was not gained.

The next morning, Cook's doughs relieved elements of the 2nd Armored Division about 2000 yards north of Rochefort. Major Sharpe's men moved farther south to protect the left flank and rear of the 1st Battalion, while the 3rd Battalion organized the important town of Humain for defense. At 1530, the 1st and 2nd Battalions jumped off to attack Rochefort, and the action which resulted turned out to be one of the most interesting highlights of the war. The 1st Battalion attacked with B and C Companies leading, B on the left. The 2nd Battalion started forward with E Company which was to the left rear of B. Then suddenly, the attack only having begun, B Company reported itself inside the town of Rochefort. Company B had advanced so swiftly through the fog of the late afternoon that the enemy was taken by surprise; in addition to this, the enemy had never expected an attack to begin so close to nightfall. Upon reaching the L'Homme River which made a semi-circle around the north, east, and west sides of Rochefort, the doughboys did not attempt to use the bridge, but waded through ice cold water of the swift running river. Once in Rochefort they quickly took cover in buildings.

Soon the enemy came to life; he attacked the B Company doughs with tanks and infantry numerous times throughout the night, this continued during the next day and the next night, for a total of 42 succeeding hours. These numerous counterattacks against the gallant members of the company never budged the men from the eight or nine buildings which they occupied and defended. B Company was now cut-off from the rest of the Regiment but the enemy would have one hell of a battle on hand in trying to wipe them out or in taking any of them prisoners. On several occasions enemy tanks rushed the buildings which the besieged company held, but so much bazooka ammunition was thrown at them, that the tanks finally gave up the idea. B Company completely outsmarted the enemy when again these heavy German tanks, out of bazooka range, fired point blank into the cellar and first story windows of the buildings sheltering our men. This tank fire had little effect, for B Company took to the upper floors and attics, thereby escaping unnecessary casualties.

On the 29th the situation remained the same for B Company. Their radio reception was faint and we only had spasmodic communication. They couldn't get out of the town of Rochefort and E, A, and C Companies couldn't get into the town. At 2200, we tried one last attempt at easing the situation for our orphaned company. Three hundred rounds of smoke shells from the 322nd and Cannon Company guns were laid on the town; we thought that the smoke might aid our doughs in withdrawing, if by now they had not all been taken prisoners. Nothing happened!

After daylight, on the 30th of December, our men in Rochefort saw civilians on the streets. Patrols were immediately sent out, and no resistance was encountered. The enemy, numbering an entire battalion, had given up hopes of ever wiping out this valiant American force, and had withdrawn during the night. At 1100, our lost B Company with prisoners which they had taken during the fight, withdrew from Rochefort and came back to the folds of the 329th Infantry Regiment. Their casualties were surprisingly light; and our mission of securing the ground south of the L'Homme River had been accomplished. A British brigade came in to relieve us but only after we had forced the Germans into abandoning the idea of ever reaching the Meuse River, the final objective which Marshall Von Rundstedt had planned on, in his daring Winter offensive.

As the new year of 1945 opened, the 329th "Buckshot" Infantry Regiment was not engaged in a mission. The operation around Rochefort had been successful and on the last day of December, 1944, we moved to the vicinity of Tohogne, Belgium, in Division reserve. Our inactivity lasted only long enough for us to spend a quiet New Year's Eve; quiet considering that some of the heaviest fighting of the war was taking place north and south of the German Salient. Another year of hard earned victories lay ahead of us — a year that eventually would mark the 329th Infantry as a leading Regiment in anybody's Army.

We followed up the advances made by the 3rd Armored Division and the 330th Infantry Regiment. More snow fell, and the roads became slippery and dangerous from the heavy traffic which was continually sliding and crawling over them. On the 3rd of January we relieved the 504th Regiment of the 82nd Airborne Division, occupying positions along the line of departure of our new sector; all three battalions were placed on line. Though we were not actually fighting the enemy as yet, we had an equally tough adversary — cold weather. The snow became deeper and the temperatures dropped steadily. Buildings in this part of Belgium were scarce and the men had difficulty in finding cover from the cold. The few shell-shaken houses which still remained were a mere sieve through which the winter gale howled with fury. We shivered and waited for further attack orders, crowding the little fires which were made with branches and empty K ration boxes.

On January the 8th, we moved forward about 5 miles to the southeast into a new assembly area. Word was received that the 3rd Armored Division would secure our line of departure after which we would pass through them; the 331st Infantry would be on our right and elements of the Armor and 82nd Airborne on our left. The following morning the attacking battalions received their proper attachments of tanks and TD's, plus a platoon of Anti-Tank guns from the AT Company. They crossed the LD at 1130, this was an east-west line running through the town of Otte with the 3rd Battalion occupying the right half of the Regimental sector, and the 2nd Battalion the left half, the 1st Battalion remained in Regimental reserve. The first objective was the vitally important town of Petite Langlir, one and a half kilometers south of the LD. The terrain was all wooded except for several hundred yards of ground which lay to the north and east of the objective. Both battalions advanced through one kilometer of woods meeting moderate resistance and intermittent fire, but as they attempted to come into the open snow covered fields, they drew heavy tank fire and well placed machine gun fire. No other way of maneuver was open to them and as it was late in the day they withdrew into the woods to spend an extremely unpleasant night.

The objective, Petite Langlir, lay directly within the zone of action of the 3rd Battalion. It was decided that this battalion would resume the attack straight south to the town. The 2nd Battalion, after advancing a few hundred yards more to the front, would then swing to the right and attack the objective from the east.

On the 10th, at 0800 and in zero weather, the 2nd Battalion jumped off in a column of companies in the order: E, F, and G. The main obstacles for E Company were the thick low hanging pines, the deep snow, and steep glistening hills. Even though they had met no opposition, their progress could not have been any faster because of the terrible weather conditions. Company F hit a strongpoint and the weather-beaten men plugged away unceasingly at it; by 1400, our riflemen had eliminated it, taking 40 odd prisoners and killing as many. The 3rd Battalion was also to have jumped off at 0800 but an enemy artillery concentration delayed their attack for 30 minutes. The attack got nowhere, however, for both K and I Companies could not advance beyond the woods due to the tremendous tank fire coming out of Petite Langlir.

This operation was proving to be our toughest since Normandy. In addition to the battle casualties which were beginning to mount up, the number of cases of frozen feet also increased. The enemy opposition consisted of all types of fire, but it was the incessant fire from the enemy tanks which tore limbs and inflicted deep wounds into our men that held up the advance. Over 10 battalions of artillery fired numerous TOT's on Petite Langlir hoping to neutralize these formidable masterpieces of German ingenuity; but the enemy changed positions from time to time and commanded every foot of terrain between the objective and our troops. Our own tanks and TD's tried to reach a point of vantage from which they could knock out the enemy tanks but they themselves lost 3 tanks and one TD. There was no conceivable way of getting around or into this strongpoint; it appeared as though we would simply have to wear the enemy out in due time.

Finally on January the 11th in a coordinated night attack with the 1st Battalion of the 331st Infantry, our 2nd Battalion, bypassing the enemy tanks, swinging left and then advancing southeast, managed to cut the road between the towns of Langlir and Petite Langlir and captured an important bridge. Meanwhile, elements of the 331st were able to get into the west part of Petite Langlir and soon both regiments moved on to capture the town of Langlir.

On the 12th the 3rd Battalion entered Petite Langlir from the same direction that the 331st Infantry had entered, and the 2nd Battalion occupied the town of Langlir. All but three of the enemy tanks which had so successfully held up our advance had managed to retreat. The 1st Battalion left the town of Grand Sart and attacked through their zone of action in a column of companies, C first, followed by B and A. By nightfall they had crossed the Langlir-Rance River. The men who fought throughout the day had worked up a sweat and settling down for the night in below zero temperatures turned the sweat to ice. Many bedding rolls did not reach the front lines; consequently the men paired off in foxholes and gained a little warmth in this manner.

With the two Langlir towns in our hands, the next mission was to increase the size of the bridgehead across the Langlir-Rance River so that the 3rd Armored could pass through us and drive south to cut the last main supply route of the Germans. Companies E and F did this; F Company drove south to a point on the new perimeter of the bridgehead, and E Company cleaned up 50 Krauts and one tank which had been bypassed during the previous night. The 1st Battalion sent out patrols to determine location and strength of the enemy. Changes in plan, boundaries, and objectives came down to us regularly. These changes made this operation appear as if the Regiment had bumped into a rotary; we had driven southwest, then south, and now we were told to continue the attack to the east. The new zone of action lay straight east, and the new mission was to clear out the 2 kilometers of woods directly to our front. Several hundred yards beyond the objective was a string of villages in a north-south line. From north to south they were Honyelez, Bovigny, and Courtil.

On the morning of the 14th, both the 1st and 2nd Battalions jumped off to the attack at 1000. Resistance was generally in the form of small groups of entrenched enemy. These groups held up the advance until they were outflanked, eliminated, or captured, and then the advance continued on to the next island of resistance. By nightfall, Companies G, B, and C had covered the 2 kilometers of woods and were on the objective which looked out upon the open area. It was decided to continue the attack and cross the open ground under cover of darkness. These men who had braved the cold for over a week attacked with lightning speed and with the hope of reaching the town in order to gain much needed shelter. By 1900, they were in the town of Honyelez accompanied by TD's. They rushed the buildings so quickly that many Germans were forced to remain with them as prisoners until morning.

At later dates the towns of Bovigny and Courtil were entered. The 3rd Armored Division established contact with another Armored Division driving north, and the German Bulge had been cut and reduced. After these 2 Armored Divisions had severed the vitally important St Vith-Houffalize highway, the once proud German Panzers retreated towards the Reich badly beaten and completely disorganized.

Again the 329th "Buckshot" Regiment had played an important role, this time in the Battle of the Ardennes. We had stopped the Germans from advancing any further out of Rochefort. We had engaged a good share of the attacking Panzer Army, forcing them to withdraw, so that a bridgehead could be secured for the Armor. But mainly, besides the constant fighting and sleepless nights, we had fought the weather — many of us lost this part of the battle.

On the 22nd of January our Regiment was relieved and pulled back to the town of Tohogne, Belgium. We billeted with Belgian families who were mighty proud of us; and they kept the fires red hot for us. We received over 570 reinforcements bringing the Regiment up to T/O strength again. We trained and cleaned equipment, and missing items were replaced. Some of us received passes to Paris and others went to a rest camp. Entertainment in many forms was presented to all of us. But, best of all, it just felt wonderful to be in a warm place with friendly people.

We left Tohogne on a secret move to the vicinity of Maastricht Holland, arriving there on the 6th of February. We weren't too eager for another combat mission but still we had a feeling that soon the 329th Infantry Regiment would be employed in the final blow against the stubborn but surely deteriorating Reich. The "Buckshot" Regiment had proved many times that it was a real fighting outfit, and once again it was ready on call when the big plan began to unfold.

FIRST TO RHINE!

We left Holland and moved to Aisdorf Germany on the 25th of February, 1945. On the 23rd the NINTH ARMY had started its operation across the Roer, the bridgehead was secured, and already elements were fanning out, pushing steadily towards the Rhine River. Soon the 329th Infantry Regiment was to join in this great offensive.

On the 28th, the Regiment moved past the battle scarred area bordering on the Roer and closed into an assembly area in the vicinity of Gusten. Up until now we had been the regiment in reserve for the 83rd Division which in turn was the division in reserve for the XIX Corps. Then orders were received committing the 329th to the attack. Rapid progress was being made by the Corps and the orders called for a move of 15 miles by motor to the northeast towards Neuss.

Lt. Col. Cook's men moved out of Gusten early in the morning of March 1st; the 2nd and 3rd Battalions followed close behind. Our Regiment was given a zone between the 330th Infantry on the left and the 331st Infantry on the right; we were to attack towards Neuss and then advance to the Rhine at a point opposite the great industrial city of Dusseldorf. The Line of Departure was placed about 5 kilometers southwest of the outskirts of Neuss. The 1st Battalion nearing the LD lost no time; they detrucked in the vicinity of Bedburdyck, marched to the Line of Departure, and jumped off at 1300. Meanwhile, the remainder of the Regiment was coming up on the main road from Titz to Neuss. The 329th "Buckshot" Infantry Regiment was on the march again — this time to the Rhine. Enemy tank fire, artillery, and infantry cut the road several miles ahead of our assembly area. Denied the use of the hard surfaced road we rerouted our convoys west through muddy open fields and over swollen creeks. And, as usual, it was raining; no words are truer than those spoken by our Regimental Commander, "If it's raining, rest assured that the 329th is attacking." By 1445 the 1st Battalion had reached the town of Loveling, where they encountered stiff resistance from stubborn German troops, close direct tank fire, mortar fire, and an unusual amount of 20mm ground leveled Ack-Ack guns. After a bitter fight the strong points were eliminated and German dead along with a few of our own were left behind as the men continued the advance.

At 1820 the outskirts of Neuss were reached by the 1st Battalion. The 2nd and 3rd Battalions pulled into the towns of Holzheim and Loveling respectively, ready on call to thwart any enemy counterattack which might develop. Word from higher headquarters informed Colonel Crabill that he should continue the attack throughout the night. It was a long night of fighting for Colonel Cook's men. They cleared city block after city block, sometimes calling for supporting artillery fire to land on a building to their immediate front. Hour after hour they methodically cleaned out cellars which hid "yellow" Germans, others, not so "yellow", were blasted out with grenades. Even bayonets were used; for the night was black and the enemy appeared from every direction. Close hand to hand combat, hidden machine guns on vague street corners, barking automatic weapons from first-story windows, the appearance of some Volkssturmers, all this and more made Neuss one Hell of a city to fight in. By 0630 the major part of Neuss with a normal population of 56,000 was ours.

The "Speedie" men of the 3rd Battalion had followed closely the advances of the 1st Battalion through Neuss. They then swung off to the east and attacked in the direction of the highway bridge over the Rhine at Dusseldorf. All during the morning of March 2nd they plugged along meeting a well aimed curtain of enemy fire. Edging their way towards the bridge they ran into 250 entrenched and determined Germans employing every weapon known to them: small arms, "Burp" guns, heavy and light machine guns, 20 mm Ack-Ack fire, self-propelled and tank fire, mortar fire, and artillery fire from the other side of the Rhine. By noon I Company on the right and K Company on the left were approximately 1000 yards from the bridge. Both companies were temporarily stymied. A frontal attack to the bank of the Rhine was suicidal — another plan of maneuver was necessary. About an hour later L Company, with brilliantly executed marching fire, went around the left flank of I Company. Every weapon was firing, every doughboy emptied and refilled his rifle several times, and the marching fire was again too much for the enemy. 500 yards to go!!! . . . 300 yards!!! . . . another plunge! . . . enemy resistance was crumbling . . . We were on the Rhine! The FIRST Infantry Regiment to reach the Rhine River, in strength, last defensive line on the Western Front.

Soon the enemy blew the east span of the bridge. Later they completed the job by blowing the span on the west side and lastly the middle span.

We immediately organized our sector for defense, and since the VII Corps, on the south side of the Erft Canal, had not advanced as far as our own troops, the exposed flank constituted a threat. The 2nd Battalion was given the mission of protecting that right flank and also the rear of the Regiment.

Shortly thereafter the 99th Infantry Division came up on our right, along the south side of the Erft Canal, and they too reached the Rhine. This relieved the threat from our rear, and the 2nd Battalion withdrew its troops to a reserve position located near the Regimental Command Post in Neuss.

On the 6 March 1945, about 2200, the I & R Platoon sent a patrol of six men with two Engineers from Company A, 308th Engineer Battalion, across the Rhine in an assault boat. The crossing was made southeast of Neuss and when they returned they brought back important information for higher headquarters: it took 8 minutes to cross the river; there was little drift; the bank on the other side was firm for heavy equipment or tanks, and there was entrenched enemy 150 yards from the far side of the river.

From March 7th to the 20th the regiment trained and conducted Battalion problems only a few miles from the Rhine. Training in the use of assault boats was started on a small lagoon in the center of a city park in Neuss. A platoon of DUKWS was attached to us. Besides DUKWS training we bettered ourselves with dry runs on village fighting and assaults on fortified positions. We fired mortars, panzerfausts, and small arms, we were damn good infantrymen, and we had shown this many times, but in the Infantry there is always room for improvement.

In Neuss there was a new problem on our hands, the problem of dealing with the German civilian population. We were new at this game but it didn't take us long to find out just what the German individual was really like. The CIC and IPW Detachments were busy screening the civilians and the rest of us assisted in every way possible. At the end of the uninterrupted checking we had discovered some 200 "real in the flesh" German soldiers humbly clothed in civilian dress; without further ado they became our prisoners. Civilians were permitted to go about and resume their positions provided it did not interfere with military operations. Most of them paid us little attention and we in return looked down upon them with the pride of conquerors and in spirit with the nonfraternization policy. Children were children — they are amiable in any country — and to this day very few of us can truthfully say that we didn't slip them a bar of chocolate or rub their dirty little heads.

Towards the end of the month we were relieved and moved to Holland in the vicinity of Sittard. This movement of over 50 miles to the rear had two purposes as far as we could ascertain: to train the Regiment on river crossings on the Maas and to place us into a position from which our next Historic operation was to begin. These practiced crossings over the Maas would in the near future pay off; at that time not one of us dreamt that this very training would take us over the Elbe River.

Elements of the NINTH Army crossed the Rhine in the vicinity of Wesel. Our role in this great operation started off with the same arrangement, as far as the 329th was concerned, as that of the Roer River crossing. We were the reserve of the reserve, the proverbial powerful "Sunday Punch."

RAG TAG CIRCUS TOURS GERMANY

We crossed the Rhine River on the night of the 29th of March, 1945. From one assembly area to another the Regiment followed up the advances of an Armored outfit. Seppenrade, over the Dortmund-Ems Canal; Ascheberg, blocking the enemy along the Lippe River, keeping up with the Armor until finally we halted at Beckum, a town 110 kilometers from the Rhine River. Here Colonel Sharpe's men and the I&R Platoon took positions in a sector 10 kilometers wide south of Beckum, along the Lippe.

On the 3rd of April orders were received committing "Buckshot's" men to the attack and the immediate mission of relieving armored elements fell to the 1st Battalion. This tank unit had been held up all day by a reported 200 SS Troops and 20 tanks in the vicinity of Neuhaus. It would take the doughboys to eliminate the strongpoint, and Colonel Cook's doughs did the job. Within an hour his battalion had captured the town of Neuhaus, taken 180 prisoners and had either dispersed or knocked out the tanks. During the short and brilliant operation not one American casualty was sustained.

Meanwhile the 3rd Battalion occupied the town of Sennelager, long remembered for its unlimited supply of Cognac which was liberated from the warehouses. That night the Combat Team of the 329th was given the outside lane of the Division sector. The mission was: the advance to the Weser River, a projected operation involving a movement forward of 89 kilometers.

They're off.... the next morning the 2nd and 3rd Battalions whizzed by Bad Lippspringe, Schlangen and Kohlstadt. By mid-day both battalions were side by side looking up at a formidable mountain ridge. The high ground was completely covered with woods with only one or two passes available for movement through the mountains. Over the hills, through the woods the men fought and advanced against determined resistance by enemy tanks and infantry. Night came with the mountain passes being secure, and the enemy defenses protecting the towns of Horn and Veldrom were encountered by the 2nd and 3rd Battalions respectively. By 0400 on April 5th both these towns were in our hands and advances up to 16 kilometers had been made.

Day after day two battalions raced on while the other, kept in reserve, rested; actually there was not much rest, because they, too, were continually moving. Battalion Commanders confronted by the lack of proper transportation for such a mad dash discovered that a tank or TD could hold 34 men each and 10 to 15 could be piled on jeeps and trailers, while their kitchen trucks would shuttle the remainder of the battalion. They also learned, to their sorrow, that this could only be accomplished at the expense of regular chow, as shuttling men on kitchen trucks invariably meant midnight suppers. The men solved this problem by rapidly acquiring German trucks, buses, ambulances, motorbikes, command cars and trailers from garages, fields or street corners. This helped relieve the difficulties of transportation and supply. A War Correspondent seeing the wild assortment of vehicles one day pinned the "Rag Tag Circus" name to the Regiment.

"The men look as though they were sprayed on the tanks", commented a General as one passed him overloaded with "Buckshooters".

Schieder, Schwalenberg and Steinheim by now had fallen to our swift advance and over just another ridgeline lay the Weser River. With all our assorted German vehicles we were rapidly catching up to the famed Armored Division on our left flank. We were now motorized, that is, we rode anything that had two to ten wheels.

The 2nd Battalion moved out from Schieder and secured another mountain pass. Immediately the 3rd Battalion led by Major White moved through the pass, and finding that the armor had moved east of Lugde leaving the road to the Weser bridgehead clear to Grohnde, pulled a clever sneak play on the armor by dashing across their bridge unnoticed and without waiting for clearance. They pushed on to Halle, east of the Weser, encountering spotty resistance. The 1st Battalion, meanwhile, was being held up by tank, small arms, and automatic weapon fire from the vicinity of Rischenau; this fanatical resistance delayed their advance. However they reached Vahlbruch by completely rerouting most of the Battalion. The 2nd Battalion in very stiff fighting continued clearing towns west of the Weser.

On April 7th, the remainder of the Regiment crossed the Weser while the 3rd Battalion, with the Division Recon Troop and the I&R Platoon attached, moved out from Halle. They cleared that part of the Regimental sector between the Weser and the mountains to the east, captured the large town of Eschershausen and secured two passes. The I&R snoopers uncovered a huge underground factory and concentration camp at Gruneplan. The 2nd Battalion, after crossing the Weser, pushed swiftly east in the direction of Alfeld and by nightfall they had reached Duingen and Delligsen, a day's advance of 20 kilometers. These two battalions did not button up for the night but continued to drive. During their fourth night of fighting, the 2nd Battalion secured the pass overlooking the Leine River, while the 3rd Battalion, also fighting night and day, made another wild dash, reached another river, the Leine, and crossed it, securing a bridge at Wispenstein. The 1st Battalion closely followed both battalions, mopping up the entire Regimental sector.

During the next two days more river crossings were made by the 2nd Battalion at Alfeld and by the 3rd Battalion at Grosse Freden, both bridges having been taken intact. The Battalions continued to the XIX Corps "Limit of Advance" line, 10 kilometers east of the Leine River. Here they settled down for a well earned rest. The 329th Infantry Regiment was not only keeping pace with the hard-driving armored columns, but at that time we were actually out in front of the best of Armors. We wrote a new chapter in Infantry History as we blitzed our way across Germany uncorking one of the final haymakers against Hitler and everyone connected with him.

We were not given much rest, for on April 9th a new attack order was received for a drive to and past the city of Halberstadt some 75 kilometers away. What really hurt, was the order detaching 10 non-organic trucks which had been used to supplement the regimental transportation. We were now on our own again. Colonel Crabill's instructions were, "Move as best you can, ride your tanks and TD's, unload your supply trucks and utilize to the fullest extent the captured German transportation". The Battalions improved on this by acquiring more German vehicles. Another ring was added to the "Rag Tag Circus" and we became a three ring display of power and might.

This was the dash to the Elbe and after that possibly Berlin or the linking up with the Russians who were also driving along a wide front. The 1st Battalion started the ball rolling around Helmscherode by clearing the woods to the east and by seizing a bridge over the Nette River at Grosse Rhuden. Resistance was encountered later at a defended roadblock but was quickly suppressed. A more serious fight took place at Langelsheim where 100 enemy defended another roadblock and were routed only after a bitter fight. Major White's Battalion was held up initially by the inadequacy of the road net in its zone, but after the capture of Langelsheim the 3rd moved through to the northeast. Brief skirmishes took place all along their route and serious resistance was encountered at Vienenburg, however a 15 kilometer advance was made before nightfall. Here, an all night fight against stubborn resistance took place. The 1st Battalion, in the meantime, had driven from Langelsheim and taken the city of Goslar and thence to Oker where fanatical resistance by young German troops with automatic weapons and panzerfausts was overcome. We suffered some casualties from these half crazed young fanatics and it was hard to lose these men because the enemy's resistance was so useless. Patrols out on the right of the Regiment discovered that all the approaches to the Harz Mountains were defended with enemy panzerfausts and automatic weapons. Battalion Anti-Tank guns supported by Anti-Tank Company covered all roads leading down from the Harz Mountains; it was later learned that this area concealed a force of 65,000 Germans, but we had no time to stop now. All in all, the 329th advanced a total of 39 kilometers that day, and captured 2,838 PW's including 2,710 in hospitals.

Another day, and this was indeed one sparked with rapid progress. Again the 1st Battalion took off and reached the German resort place of Bad Harzburg in no time. Lt. Col. Sharpe's men headed north and spear-headed against light resistance. Here and there, as at Langeln, determined enemy was encountered but no power on earth could stop Colonel Crabill's men in their infantry—armor tactics. Near Derenberg a column of approximately 700 British and American PW's was liberated — it would be hard to find a happier bunch of men. The 3rd Battalion once started could not be touched. Infantry columns on tanks, TD's, and even German trucks drove east from Vienenburg, clearing one town after another. Although their zone ran to the north of Halberstadt, Major White found himself closest to the city so he drove in against heavy small arms fire. Receiving aid from the 2nd Battalion, both battalions completed the capture of the much-bombed city. They stopped only long enough to reorganize as best they could and then drove out to Groningen and Wegeleben while the 1st Battalion mopped up whatever resistance remained in Halberstadt. This full day of excellent movement pushed the regiment 46 kilometers nearer the Elbe and resulted in the capture of 5,428 PW's.

April the 12th was the day of high hopes and hard fighting. Third Battalion men who had fought all night in Groningen started shortly after daybreak on a dash to the Elbe in an attempt to secure the railroad bridge at Barby. Throughout the day the infantry made excellent progress against light opposition and by 1400 they had reached the outskirts of the town which was their objective. Here they were stymied in all of their attempts to reach the railroad bridge and the Elbe River by about 800 determined enemy troops. The enemy was equipped with automatic weapons, panzerfausts and mortars, and fought from well placed, dug-in defensive positions. Not even with the help of the 2nd Battalion which had swept its sector and arrived at Barby around 1800, was it possible to dislodge the enemy. Several of our tanks and TD's were lost in the action and many infantry boys who had come a long way were killed and wounded. It was impossible to continue the attack throughout the night, because "Buckshot's" men were too exhausted after several days of continuous movement, marching, and fighting. At 1745 that evening the enemy set-off the charge on the railroad bridge over the Elbe River destroying our hopes of ever using it. During the night the enemy withdrew to the east bank of the Elbe, and at 0945 on the 13th of April, 1945, the town of Barby surrendered. The 329th Infantry Regiment was on the Elbe!!!

From the vicinity of Sennelager, Germany on the 3rd of April, 1945, men of the 329th advanced 265 kilometers in 10 days. This outstanding advance was made possible not only by the initiative of our leaders, but also by the willingness and the tirelessness of all men in the ranks. Night after night we fought, day after day we moved and marched and fought halfway across Germany. We endured sleepless nights, suppers at 0100 and breakfast at 0530 and earlier. Too tired to eat, many of us subsisted on one K ration unit per day to make this drive possible. The swiftness of our advance prevented the enemy from keeping up continuous resistance, thereby the casualties which we might have suffered were undoubtedly lightened. During the course of the advance we cleared 172 cities, towns and villages, and captured 12,845 PW's some of whom were hospitalized.

We, the officers and enlisted men of the 329th Infantry Regiment, were the greatest performers in the greatest show ever put on. The Rag Tag Circus had done its job well, but the job was not quite finished as yet.

"After crossing the Rhine, we were continually on the road, following the rapid advances of the 2nd Armored Division."

"Committed to the attack on April 3rd, the 'Rag Tag Circus' was formed and immediately headed for Berlin."

"We moved so rapidly that CP's were established momentarily on hilltops."

From the vicinity of Sinspeltlager, Germany on the 3rd of April, 1945, men of the 329th advanced 100 kilometers in 10 days. This outstanding advance was made possible, not only by the initiative of our leaders, but also by the willingness of our men. Night after night we fought, day after day we marched. We crossed Germany's border at 0530 hours. Our lead tank unit pushed forward and our advance proved to be a surprise to the enemy. The casualties were heavy. During the campaign we captured...

...We, the men of the 329th, were the greatest performers in the war. We had captured...

"Tanks and TD's rolled on with as many as 30 doughs aboard them."

"XXIX TAC's A-2 section carefully followed our sensational drive, selecting air targets well ahead of us."

"We wrote a new chapter in Infantry History as we blitzed our way across Germany averaging 25 to 30 kilometers daily."

"Gloom — German Prisoners of War."

"Joy — liberated Allied prisoners and forced laborers."

"We wrote a new chapter in history, history as we looked out over across Germany stretching to the Rhine's valley."

"Joy — liberated Allied prisoners and found happiness."

"Blood — German prisoners of War."

WE CROSS THE ELBE, HOLD THE BRIDGEHEAD, AND MEET THE RUSSIANS

The morning of the 13th of April, 1945, the news of the death of our great leader, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, reached us. We mourned the loss of probably the greatest statesman and leader our country had ever known. The Vice-President, Harry S. Truman, was sworn in as President of the United States a few hours after the official announcement of President Roosevelt's death - 12th April, 1945, 1535 (EST) in Warm Springs, Georgia.

With Barby in our hands, the crossing of the Elbe River and the establishment of a bridgehead was ordered. We temporarily abandoned our tanks, tank destroyers, jeeps and captured German vehicles; and, defying all superstitions, the 1st Battalion crossed the Elbe River on Friday, the 13th, at 1330, in assault boats, meeting little opposition under cover of an artillery smoke screen. The crossing had caught the enemy unprepared. Lt. Colonel Cook's men immediately moved inland and reached the town of Walter-nienburg. Soon the 2nd Battalion crossed the river and followed the 1st Battalion, moving in on their left. Colonel "Buckshot" Crabill, our Regimental Commander, gave priority to our tanks and Anti-Tank weapons on the Engineer ferries; this later proved to be the salvation of the bridgehead, for by now the enemy had sensed our activity on the east bank of the Elbe.

During the night between 1830 and 2400 the enemy uncorked four severe counterattacks of battalion strength supported by 20 or more assault guns. The morale of the enemy attacking force was excellent, for they had just finished wiping out an attempted bridgehead a short way to the north of us. They attacked and fought savagely, but every attempt to penetrate our 1st and 2nd Battalions' positions was thrown back with heavy losses. That night the 329th Infantry Regiment held the only bridgehead across the Elbe River, and "Jerry" definitely did not like the idea.

Meanwhile, the 3rd Battalion crossed and took up reserve positions in the bridgehead, while NINTH Army Engineers were busy stringing pontoons and treadways across the river at a ferry site south of the town of Barby. By morning of the 14th the pontoon bridge was completed, and everything poured over it: artillery pieces, the battalions' organic transportation, attached units, tank destroyers and a Combat Command from the 2nd Armored Division. A plan of attack to the east to enlarge the bridgehead was called off. One battalion from the 331st Infantry Regiment crossed the river and took up positions on our south flank to help hold the bridgehead against further large-scale counterattacks.

On the 15th it was decided to attack and widen the bridgehead just enough to make our positions more secure. At 0930 both the 1st and 3rd Battalions jumped off, the 3rd Battalion passing through Lt. Colonel Sharpe's Battalion on the left. Both battalions met very stiff resistance from strong enemy Infantry groups, tanks, selfpropelled guns, bazooka fire and well placed machine gun fire; but they advanced more than 5 kilometers to the east, taking the towns of Nutha and Gutergluck respectively. They then prepared the defense of these towns along the line of a north and south stream.

Bright and early the next morning the enemy attacked the towns of Nutha and Gutergluck with all the power and ferocity he could amass. Against the 1st Battalion in Nutha, the enemy came with two companies of Infantry and 10 or more assault guns. Cook's doughboys met the enemy attack, and after a vigorous battle which lasted well over an hour, the Germans retreated badly broken up and beaten. The 3rd Battalion in the town of Gutergluck received a counterattack reminiscent of the hard battles of the hedgerows. An estimated enemy battalion and a large undetermined number of tanks and assault guns drove within bayonet distance of our defending infantrymen. This attack succeeded in penetrating that northern part of Gutergluck held by the adjacent unit to the left, but Major White's men held their ground firmly and then assisted the unit on their left in clearing out the part of Gutergluck retaken by the enemy. In this attack along the entire bridgehead area the enemy infantry suffered heavy losses, and our attached TD's and supporting artillery also played important roles in knocking out most of the assault guns and many of the tanks. After this total failure, the enemy bothered us no more on the ground, but night after night enemy fighters and bombers came over the bridgehead area in a last desperate attempt to knock out the bridge, but the bridge remained intact. That bridge over the Elbe River became the first Army project to be dedicated to our new President, Harry S. Truman.

The following days we spent strengthening our defensive positions; we would not advance beyond the lines which we now held, but would remain in the present bridgehead area until the Russians arrived to relieve us. One afternoon the Commanding General of the NINTH Army, General Simpson, visited the bridgehead and complimented Colonel Crabill and his regiment for the spectacular feat we had accomplished in our rapid advance from the Rhine River to the Elbe Bridgehead.

On about the 22nd there was much excitement as our radio command net reported the Russians to be closing in nearer to us. As a result, the 329th Command Post was overrun by War Correspondents and Signal Photographers. All attempts were made during the entire afternoon to contact the Russians by radio; Russian voices were heard, but no communication could be established. Later, a German civilian was sent to the city of Zerbst in an attempt to talk the Commander of the German garrison into surrendering the city. He returned with an emphatic, "No".

On the 23rd, 24th, 25th, 26th and 27th we made more attempts to have the garrison of Zerbst surrender to us, but each offering was refused. We did, however, establish radio contact with the Russians, giving them our location; but they could not disclose their positions without authority from the High Soviet Command.

Shortly after noon on the 28th of April, the 329th "Buckshot" Regiment was ordered by Division to attack the city of Zerbst at 1500. At 1400, two civilian representatives of the Burgomeister of Zerbst entered the Regimental Command Post and pleaded with us to come in and take the city without firing because of the suffering which the civilian populace had endured from our previous bombing and shelling. They also added that the German soldiers in Zerbst could not surrender, yet, they insisted that we would meet no resistance in entering the town. The attack was postponed until 1600 in order to give these two beggars another chance in trying to get the garrison to surrender before we attacked the town. Again they refused, and although we could be given no guarantee, we were told that no resistance from the Jerries would be met. We decided to gamble, and canceled the smoke and artillery preparation originally planned for the attack.

At 1600 the 2nd and 3rd Battalions jumped off, the 2nd passing through the 1st Battalion. We advanced carefully, but rapidly, without meeting opposition, and by 1730 had taken and occupied all of the city of Zerbst. About 900 prisoners were taken for the day, nearly nine times as many as had been reported there. This "take" also pushed our prisoner of war total over the 40,000 mark. Not one shot was fired by either side during this last operation of the 329th Infantry in Europe.

On April the 29th, an administrative group, commanded by our Regimental Executive Officer, Lt. Colonel Pack, left the bridgehead area and went back 65 kilometers to the vicinity of Wegeleben to handle the administration of thousands of Allied displaced persons and prisoners. Our initial trial at Military Government in Germany was a big success. The eastern DP's (Russians, Poles, Slovacs, etc. . .) were segregated and placed into individual camps; western DP's (French, Dutch and Belgians) were treated likewise. Under the close supervision of Col. Pack and his MG group, living conditions and the feeding of these unfortunate slave laborers, improved greatly. When reports were turned into higher headquarters, they found them to be the most thorough and improved ones yet received.

This 329th MG group received commendations galore, which only proved that the 329th "Buckshot" Regiment was not only a fighting outfit, but one which knew how to deal with human difficulties as well.

On the 30th of April a Cavalry Group attached to the 83rd Division made physical contact with the Russian Army at Appellensdorf. Two days later a German colonel came through our 2nd Battalion lines with the information that he wanted to turn over to us over 19,000 famished Allied prisoners of war located in a PW camp near Altengrabow, 25 miles north-east of Zerbst. We accepted his proposition and in the following days, under the able direction of Colonel Sharpe, hundreds of Army trucks and ambulances carried thousands of Allied prisoners, over 1200 of whom were Americans, across the Truman Bridge and on to the road which would bring them home.

On May 4th, 1945, the Russians came in to relieve our bridgehead sector. We loaded all of our equipment on vehicles and headed for a rear area — the European War was unofficially over for us. On May 8th, in the German town of Wolfenbittel, we listened to Prime Minister Churchill announce to the World that the Germans had accepted unconditional surrender, and the following day, May 9th, 1945, was officially proclaimed as V-E Day. Our fighting in Europe had finished and we began to wonder what the future had in store for the "Three Two Nine".

"The 1st Battalion crossed the Elbe River on Friday the 13th, 1945, in assault boats."

"The Battalions' organic transportation was ferried across the Elbe shortly after the assault waves had secured the east bank."

"Lt Col Cook's command jeep on its way to the town of Walternienburg where his troops were severely counterattacked."

"We mourned the death of our great leader, President Roosevelt, and an American flag at half mast hung over the Elbe bridgehead."

"By noon of April the 14th, NINTH Army Engineers had completed this treadway bridge."

"The bridge later became the first Army project to be dedicated to our new President, Harry S. Truman."

"A bazooka team crouched in a huge bomb crater ready for the next enemy counterattack against the Elbe bridgehead."

"This is the open field north of Walternienburg where the enemy vainly tried marching fire against us."

"General Macon with Russian Liaison Officer after radio contact had been established with Russian tankers."

"General Simpson, NINTH Army Commander and General McLain, XIX Corps Commander complimented Colonel Crabill and the Regiment on our spectacular 200 mile advance across Germany and over the Elbe."

"A German Convoy, complete with Staff, rode into Zerst to surrender to our 2nd Battalion."

"The frantic rush of German troops to our lines to avoid capture by the Russians, pushed our PW total over the 45,000 mark."

"Liberated French PW's from Camp Altengrabow on the road to France and Freedom. Altengrabow had held over 19,000 Allied prisoners of War, 1200 of whom were American."

IN MEMORY OF THOSE MEN WHO SO VALIANTLY
GAVE THEIR LIVES THAT OTHERS MIGHT LIVE

I am the Ressurrection and the Life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live.

(John, 11:25)

WE SHALL NEVER FORGET THEIR DEEDS AND
THEIR SACRIFICES, NOR SHALL WE FORGET
OUR DEBT TO THEM WHICH, IN THE WORDS OF OUR COLONEL, CAN NEVER BE PAID

WE THANK: —

The 322nd Field Artillery Battalion, whose guns pounded the enemy into the ground thereby enabling our troops to advance from Normandy to the Elbe River, and beyond to the city of Zerbst, Germany.

Company A, 308th Engineer Battalion, whose men untiringly dug up many dangerous mines, aided us in establishing strong defensive positions, and ferried us over the many streams and rivers during all of our campaigns.

Company A, 308th Medical Battalion, whose ambulances braved all the known dangers of warfare to evacuate our many wounded and speed them on to proper medical treatment.

The 330th and 331st Infantry Regiments, who fought side by side with us against the same determined enemy, enduring the same sufferings, and enjoying the same glory after the battles were won.

The 83rd Division Reconnaissance Cavalry Troop, who, on many occasions, screened to our front and made future assembly areas and initial objectives much easier for us to reach.

Every other unit in the 83rd Infantry Division for their cooperation.

Every Tank and Tank Destroyer Battalion, whose company was attached to the 329th.

Every Infantry and Armored Division in the ETO, for without them we could not have won the war.

The 329th "Buckshot" Regiment in the ETO —

from Liverpool, England - April 19, 1944 to Zerbst, Germany - April 28, 1945
